Excerpt from A Monograph of the Mycetozoa: Being a Descriptive Catalogue of the Species in the Herbarium of the British Museum Monograph that Van Tieghem in 1880 and Brefeld in 1884 corrected this View. Accepting the Mycetozoa as established by Rostafinski, but excluding Dictyosteliwm on the ground of its not forming a true plasmodium, we have a clearly defined group of organisms separated from all others by the following combination Of characters. A spore provided with a firm wall produces on germination an amoeboid swarm-cell which soon acquires a ?agellum. The swarm-cells multiply by division and subsequently coalesce to form a plasmodium which exhibits a rhythmic streaming. The plasmodium gives rise to fruits which consist of supporting structures and spores; in the Endosporece these have the form Of sporangia, each having a wall within which the free spores are developed. A capillitium or system of threads forming a Scaffolding among the spores is present in most genera. In the Exosporeoe the fruits consist Of Sporophores bearing numer ous Spores on their surface. The Spore and Swarm-cell. - The spores of the Endosporece are mostly spherical, but occasionally they are ellipsoid. Their size is uniform in each species, or with so little variation that their measurement affords a valuable character for Specific determination. This is not without exception; for instance, in the abundant Species Leocarpus fmgilis the spores are commonly 11 to 12 p. Diameter, but in occasional gatherings they average 16 to 20 M. In other genera which present ample material for comparison, Similar variation is sometimes met with. The spore-wall is variously coloured in the different species. It is described by Zopf as Showing the chemical reaction of cellulose, and consisting Of...
