Excerpt from Plans for a Model Jail, And, a Departmental Plan for a Detention Home for Delinquent Women: Presented at the Fifty-First Congress of the American Prison Association, Jacksonville, Florida, 1921 A community low in scale of social development, governed under laws fitted to this stage, would need a jail building quite different in character from that of a more highly developed people, and it follows that in that society toward which we are working, where the attempt of revenge on and punishment of the law breaker will be replaced by the persistent aim of his reformation and education, the functions or administration of the jail would so change in character that the building or buildings for the purpose could most likely no longer be designated as jails. There are, however, some general well-established laws and canons of architecture and good building which should be followed in the jail proper or cell house of any jail building, no matter where located or how administered, on which a few words may be said. When one considers that only a limited number (if those confined in a jail are proved guilty of the crime for which they were arrested, and that many are held there for very minor offenses, the planning and architectural treatment of the building becomes of peculiar interest in the problem it presents. No fair-minded man will deny for a moment that the innocent and the one not convicted of a crime should not be subjected to greater hardships than are absolutely necessary during the time that he is deprived of his liberty by the state, and it is encouraging to note that society has...
